

There is a compounded inconsistency here on the part of the state, in its actions, which indicates it is wholly a stranger to values and is living a life of emotion in a practical world.

Its subjects, on the other hand, are quite oblivious to the fact that they are public charges thru their affiliation with the state, in the reverse cycle never complete.

What's the big idea of keeping Capone in Nirvana and Insull in Greece?

(Note: Capone transcended the system; Insull didn't.)

Child-labor may not rate an amend in the constitution, many things considered, so I will give you a remedy for cradle snatching:

Federal government shall pay each child under 19 years of age a sum of money equal to the wages he or she gets from the kind and gentle forman, upon demand; and—LET THE DEVIL TAKE THE HINDMOST.

Such a program would send the problem around the Horn and when it got back—Oh my!—when it got back? The country would be full of constitutional menders and Nicholas Murray Butler, a good old skate, would be hopping up and down on his true and trusty bunions, yelling: "Slap it to her, slap it to her!"
