

philosophy (idea) is out of tune with the problem.
 Next day another hour might be chopped off and so on until only half the work-hours remained

I am quite sure when this ideal is reached the cure shall have been complete, for wise men tell me:
 "Shorten the hours and wages will take care of themselves" — after all, demand for labor-power is a contributing factor in the encouragement of the boss to boost the wages. (assumption is the workers are organized or they <sup>would</sup> ~~wouldn't~~ have the shorter hours and unemployment still be in a state ill-repute.)

Over 11,000,000 unemployed are still hugging the sunny side of buildings these cold spring days — say one-third of the working class, of the "production for use..."

That's where they are in this country, on the lee-side of building or walling over in Europe the unemployed are on the battlefields

The boss, the employer, has a heart that expands surprisingly when he is shorthanded for whatever reason, even so as it contracts equally as much and suddenly whenever the supply of labor-power fulfills the demand.
 Therefore, I am convinced that in the event of an emergency his heart would swell and he would bid the wages high, temporarily at least. And even if does backslide and his heart shrinks to the size of a sweet-pea it doesn't mean a thing other than that the workers should thereupon chop another hour off the workday and cause the employers heart to re-swell to the proportions it was before.
 It does him good.

No. You cannot unite the workers by striking up additional unions — that is division (I learned in school) and subtracts from the powers of the working class.

One Big Union is the thing — not only worldwide but international and national, industrial in manner and form. For workers are in direct contact with their own industry and positively acquainted with the conditions with
