

There's a rift in the clouds like a tear in the shrouds
And the sun comes barging through;
There's a sweeter note in the bullfrog's throat
And the sky seems pale — but blue.
But industrial life ever cuts like a knife
And the pain goes round with the clock:
No propellers turn where the longings burn
And the MASTER paces the dock.