

The time has come once again when we must return to "the simple life." The capitalist system no longer reciprocates in the overall of industry and artificial respiration must be resorted to in order to preserve miscellaneous industry; at the expense of war industry. Artificial redistribution of war industry's profits, (excess or otherwise is immaterial) is rather a crude performance and difficult of accomplishment in this age of "devil take the hindmost."

But the racket known as capitalism is very dear to the gentlemen of Wall St, Bond St as well as Downing St and one can almost perform miracles for the one he loves. So we may expect the war industries to whack-up their gains with the more penurious industries, by their side — 8 percent of course (in that light) would be wholly an insufficient rate-off for these noble humanitarians building destruction — For our theme song is: it would be a mistake to cut out war profits; our almost sole support and consolation, in the prospective.

Equally difficult it is to whack-up the wages of the war-industry's workers among the millions of unemployed, millions of entrate workers and other millions of part-time workers. Yes, it would take a pile of moral persuasion, repeated references to Old Glory, Pope of Rome and Bishop Manning, (to say nothing about Jehovah's Eye-Witnesses) — for we no longer have the saving grace of racket argument to bolster our plea.
