

If it be right for law to kill few, it is right for war to kill many; one is as right as the other; and both — are wrong. One shall "BE" as long as the other and there is no use in the endeavors to end one without disturbing its counterpart; for they draw sustenance from one another.

"Executions" in war and peace puts law into individual hands...

"But," you say, "war kills the innocent." That is not so — war kills only the guilty: Each so killed by war were a party to killing by law — and, if the law holds, each new killing justifies the next. It's a bloody trail we are following and our coup de grace is just around the corner.

So far, not a state has risen that wasn't an expert in killing.

Revenge, retribution and retaliation all play their parts and those each, in themselves, are acts of war.

Noble heroes!
