

Finland went to war more or less united.

Germany is prosecuting war with a certain enforced unity. They're on the boss' bandwagon. St. Peter waits to greet them.

And so it goes

Division within the working class makes it possible for the boss to tread out his bandwagon. It's a one way ride.

Hm. Didn't know that simple, common wage slavery could stir up such bitter animosities.

Could it be you are fighting for a right to slave? "Communist; collar, hames and bridle?"

What has that got to do with daily chores and dissipation of energies?

Blue-plate broadened of 3 dozen fried eggs makes a nice stack of hot-cakes.

Seldom it happens that a commandante gets killed or injured in war. The percentage is about the same as the bosses' ^{injuries.} in industrial pursuits.

In war time the only way an employer can be killed is with a spray-gun — you do not shoot bedbugs with a rifle.

So in view of the almost absolute safety a boss or commander has in war, and the terrible casualties suffered by the workers and privates, I've come to the conclusion that all wars are bosses wars even so as the capitalist system is the bosses self-benefit program at workers expense. Where is people's rule when labor unions ride the bosses bandwagon?

Where do the unions get authority to carry on disputes among themselves and jeopardize the livelihood of 30,000,000 unemployed and dependents in U.S.A.?
